SEND FARM LABORERS TO VERMONT.

In applying to the executives of the various states for information as to the kinds of employment, in which there is a shortage of laborers, the national government has instituted a movement which ought to solve the problem of immigration in large measure. The questions asked include, "Where is the demand for workmen most urgent?" "What class of labor is needed?" "What nationalities or races would be preferred?" and "If strikes, lockouts or other differences exist, state fully the cause of the same."

When Governor Proctor of Vermont answers the interrogations, we expect that the plea which he will advance will be for an influx of farm laborers, chiefly those from the north of Europe. There seems to be a plenty of workmen in most every other branch of activity of any magnitude here in Vermont, but the farmer has a hard time finding competent, reliable men to assist him in raising his crops. Vermont needs farm laborers today as she has not needed them for years. This is due to the fact that the members of this class of workers have turned, for various reasons, to the so-called skilled occupations, leaving their places either vacant or poorly filled. We must depend on the newcomers to fill the vacancies. Vermont can stow away quite a number of these immigrants, and Governor Proctor will probably so notify the bureau of immigrants.

WOOLING SLEEP.

A Prescription That Worked Well in Philadelphia.

A haggard looking man stroiled into a downtown drug store the other day and asked the druggist for help. He said he had trouble in getting to sleep when he retired. No matter how sleepy he might be during the day or how much sleep he might have lost, the moment his head touched the pillow he was wide awake and lay thus for several hours. Once asleep he was very hard to waken, but he had to be up at a certain hour, and in consequence of his peculiar affliction he was losing more sleep than he could stand. The drug clerk regarded him quizzically a few moments and then replied:

"My dear man, you don't want medicine. What you want is something to change the trend of your thoughts. Do as a friend of mine did. He was troubled the same way and found that the old folks' plan of imagining sheep passing a barrier and counting them was out of date, so he began trying to name all the states in the Union. He soon got them so he could classify them alphabetically. Then when they no longer interested him, he started on the counties of his state. He now has them at his tongue's end, classified up to the fourth letter. Now he is starting on state capitals and their locations. Then he will take up county seats. A moment's glance at an atlas during the day shows him when he is wrong, and the beauty of the plan is that he rarely has to think along these lines longer than ten minutes before he is sound asleep. To make it short, the study of geography is a good narcotic."—Philadelphia Record.

A Doctor's Ruse.

(Original.)
My telephone bell rang, and I took up my receiver.

"I am Dr. Forbes."
"Please call at 874 Twelfth street."
"What name?"
"Mrs. Partridge."

I had no patients in Twelfth street, which was not a locality I cared to practice in. I had never heard of Mrs. Partridge and wondered why she had called me. Nevertheless I responded. I found a woman more than sixty years of age, whose appearance and home were by no means prepossessing. She told me that she was very much run down and wished a tonic. I wrote a prescription, and she asked me what I was giving her. I told her the spirits of gentian. She said she had taken a great deal of it and it had done her no good. She had once taken arsenic, and it had built her up. I wrote a new prescription for arsenic, gave it to her and hurried away to a very important case awaiting me.

The next day I received a hurry call to Mrs. Partridge, whom I found groaning as if in great pain. She told me that I must have made a mistake in the quantity of the dose I had prescribed, for she had taken only half a dose and was in great agony. I asked to see the bottle containing the medicine. She showed it to me, and the dose marked on it was quite enough to kill. I suspected something wrong. Her sufferings appeared to be feigned.

"The prescription is with the druggist, I suppose," I said.
"No. I always have him return my prescriptions. I prefer to keep them."
"Let me see it."
She had stopped groaning and seemed to be thinking. Then she opened a pocketbook that she took from under the pillow and held it up for me to look at. I reached for it, but she drew it away. The amount of arsenic in each tablet was fifty times what I had ordered. I saw through the game at once. The amount had been raised. I had fallen into a blackmail trap. The charge, even though false, would greatly injure me.

"How much do you expect for your sufferings and the prescription?" I asked.
The woman's expression changed at once. There was a devilish cunning in it.

"A hundred dollars," she said.
I felt that it might be wise to pay the money, but I have a natural dislike to being fleeced. I sat looking at the woman, thinking of some way to thwart her.

"I suppose," I said presently, "I ought to indemnify you for my mistake, especially as I have caused you to suffer. But if I don't it will require a long time for you to collect by law."
"But your reputation!"

"The damage to that I may outlive, but you will not live long enough to get the damages."

"What do you mean?" anxiously.

"You are suffering from a disease that will soon kill you."

"I suffering from a disease! What disease?" she asked, turning white as a sheet.

"Something that few practitioners would recognize. It is my specialty."

"For heaven's sake, what is it?"

"A nervous of the pericardium."

"Oh, doctor!"

"It won't kill you immediately."

"How do you know I've got it?"

"By the color of the cuticle. That's where the disease first shows itself. Only a practiced eye can see it. You will soon feel a phthisis in the cerebellum, then."

"But can't you stop it?"

"I could stop it, but the world is better without such people as you. Then
